

Original citation:

Schnurr, S. and Zayts, O. (2012). "You have to be adaptable, obviously". Constructing professional identities in multicultural workplaces in Hong Kong. Pragmatics, 22(2), pp. 279 - 299.

Permanent WRAP url:

<http://wrap.warwick.ac.uk/48089>

Copyright and reuse:

The Warwick Research Archive Portal (WRAP) makes the work of researchers of the University of Warwick available open access under the following conditions. Copyright © and all moral rights to the version of the paper presented here belong to the individual author(s) and/or other copyright owners. To the extent reasonable and practicable the material made available in WRAP has been checked for eligibility before being made available.

Copies of full items can be used for personal research or study, educational, or not-for-profit purposes without prior permission or charge. Provided that the authors, title and full bibliographic details are credited, a hyperlink and/or URL is given for the original metadata page and the content is not changed in any way.

Publisher's statement:

Published by International Pragmatics Association

A note on versions:

The version presented here is a working paper or pre-print that may be later published elsewhere. If a published version is known of, the above WRAP url will contain details on finding it.

For more information, please contact the WRAP Team at: wrap@warwick.ac.uk

<http://go.warwick.ac.uk/lib-publications>

‘You have to be adaptable, obviously’.
Constructing professional identities in multicultural workplaces in Hong Kong

Stephanie Schnurr & Olga Zayts
The University of Warwick & The University of Hong Kong

Abstract

In spite of the increasing globalisation of the work domain and the mobilization of the workforce (Wong et al. 2007) only very little attention has been paid to the interplay between culture and professional identities in workplace contexts. This paper addresses this gap by exploring some of the ways through which professionals are required to construct and negotiate their various identities in increasingly multicultural contexts where notions of culture often become particularly salient.

We focus on multicultural workplaces where, we believe, the intricate and complex relationship between culture and identity is particularly well reflected: in these contexts members are on a daily basis exposed to culture-specific perceptions, assumptions, expectations, and practices which are ultimately reflected in workplace communication, and which impact on how professional identities are constructed.

Drawing on a corpus of more than 80 hours of authentic workplace discourse and interviews conducted with professionals we explore how expatriates who work in Hong Kong with a team of local Chinese construct, negotiate and combine aspects of their professional and their cultural identities. Our particular focus is on two issues that have been identified in participants’ interviews: sharing decision making responsibilities and negotiating a work-life balance. An analysis of these two aspects illustrates the complex processes of identity construction from two different but complementary perspectives: i) the ways in which participants portray themselves as adapting to, negotiating or rejecting the new culture in which they work and live; and ii) the ways in which these perceived identity construction processes are actually reflected in participants’ workplace discourse.

Key words: cultural identity; professional identity; social constructionism; multicultural workplaces; Hong Kong; shared decision making; work-life balance

1. Introduction

Identity is increasingly recognised as an important issue in organisational communication (e.g. Holmes 2000b; Kendall & Tannen 1997; Angouri & Marra fc). In this paper we focus on a particular aspect of professional identities, namely the impact of culture. While the link between culture and identity is much researched (e.g. Kim 2007; Hall & Du Gay 1996), the construction and performance of culture as a crucial component of professional identities in workplace contexts, in particular in multicultural workplaces, are often neglected. This gap is particularly surprising considering the globalisation of the work domain and mobilization of the workforce (Wong et al. 2007; Portes 2003), which often require professionals to construct and negotiate their various identities in increasingly multicultural contexts where notions of culture often become particularly salient.

This paper aims to address this research gap by exploring how professional identities are constructed and negotiated in multicultural workplaces in ways that reflect interlocutors’ cultural assumptions and beliefs. In particular, if we understand cultural identities (following Kidd (2002: 26)) as ‘a sense of belonging to a distinct ethnic, cultural or subcultural group’, and if we agree with Holliday (2010: 175) who views the profession as being an integral aspect of cultural identity, the close link between the notions of cultural and professional identities becomes obvious. Our focus in this paper is on multicultural workplaces where, we believe, this intricate relationship between culture and identity is particularly well reflected because members are on a daily basis exposed to culture-specific perceptions, assumptions, expectations, and practices which all contribute to the construction and negotiation of their professional (and cultural) identities.

More specifically, in this paper we aim to explore how expatriates who live and work in Hong Kong construct, negotiate and combine aspects of their professional and their cultural identities. We have chosen Hong Kong as the focus of our study since it is a prime example of a place where people from a diversity of multicultural backgrounds live and work together. Hong Kong has been described as ‘the city where East meets West’ (Chan 2005: 75; Cheng 2003; Brooks, 2004). And although the non-Chinese community in Hong Kong accounts for only 5% of the population¹, members of the expatriate community are well-represented in various commerce and industry sectors². This multicultural and multilingual workforce of expatriates from all over the world brings with it not only professional expertise, knowledge and skills but also culturally influenced ideas, assumptions and expectations about how things are most appropriately and most effectively to be done in a workplace context. As Imahori and Cupach (2005: 195) note, ‘[d]ifferent cultures [...] have different expectations regarding which communicative behaviors are considered effective and socially appropriate.’ And these culturally influenced expectations, we argue, ultimately have an impact on how interlocutors construct their professional identities in relation to each other taking into account the wider socio-cultural context in which they interact.

2. Theorising identity construction in intercultural encounters

Several theories have been developed that conceptualise and explain the construction and negotiation of identity in intercultural encounters. Gudykunst et al. (2005), for example, outline four major theories that approach identity negotiation or management: cultural identity theory (Collier & Thomas 1988), identity management theory (Cupach & Imahori 1993), identity negotiation theory (Ting-Toomey 1993), and communication theory of identity (Hecht 1993). While each of these theories provides interesting insights into how interlocutors construct and negotiate their cultural identities in intercultural encounters, they have been criticised for not sufficiently capturing the role of communication in these processes (Gudykunst et al. 2005: 17).

This paper, thus takes a social constructionist perspective, which treats the construction of identities as a constantly shaping and developing process (Holmes, 2000a). In this process the various aspects of identity are conceptualised as being ‘maintained and (re-)created through social practices, including language practices’ (Kendall & Tannen, 1997: 83). In contrast to the theories mentioned above, a social constructionist perspective enables us to approach identity construction via an analysis of linguistic practices. In other words, we look at how interlocutors construct and negotiate their own and each others’ identities in and

¹ Population by Ethnicity 2001 and 2006,

http://www.censtatd.gov.hk/hong_kong_statistics/statistical_tables/index.jsp?tableID=139&ID=&subjectID=1

² Working population by Occupation, Duration of Residency in Hong Kong and Ethnicity,

<http://www.censtatd.gov.hk>

through talk, and how they portray themselves (and each other) as particular kinds of people in their discourse. However, as Marra and Holmes (2008: 399) note, 'it is important to bear in mind that linguistic features and ways of speaking do not directly encode social meanings such as ethnicity, but rather do so indirectly through their associations with particular rites, activities, traits and stances'. Thus, there is no one-to-one relation between specific ways of talking and certain identities. Rather, linguistic forms are implicitly associated with certain identities via the interactional stances that they evoke (Ochs, 1993).

In contrast to earlier theories, social constructionism sees identity not as a fixed and static category based on the attributes attached to individuals, but defines it as 'a dynamic construct that may not only develop and change over time but is also context dependent' (Ellemers et al, 2003: 13; Hall et al, 1999; Hall, 2000). As a consequence of this conceptualisation of identity, identity construction is not viewed as an individual act but as a process that involves others. As such, identities are constructed not only in local contexts but also in relation and in collaboration with others (see also Schnurr & Zayts et al.). Moreover, as social constructionism acknowledges, an individual's multiple identities may not necessarily be in harmony with each other but may give rise to certain tensions (Sunderland & Litosseliti 2002; Lytra 2009). And it seems that in intercultural encounters where professionals have to interact with people from different cultural backgrounds the relationship between their cultural and their professional identities is particularly complex. As Fougère (2009: 188) maintains, 'it is particularly interesting to study them [identities] in intercultural contexts because it is exactly in such contexts that people often reflect more about them.'

Our aim is to explore this intricate relationship between professional and cultural identities, and to illustrate some of the ways in which they impact on and interact with each other, with a particular focus on the ways in which participants' cultural perceptions and beliefs become relevant for the construction of their professional identities.

3. Data

The data analysed in this study is part of a larger corpus of workplace interactions collected in a range of different workplaces in Hong Kong, ranging from small privately-owned companies to large international financial corporations. Our data collection methodology follows closely the procedures developed by the Language in the Workplace Project (see e.g. Holmes & Stubbe 2003). The corpus comprises more than 80 hours of video- and audio-recordings of authentic workplace discourse. These primary data are supplemented by audio-recorded interviews with participants, notes from participant observation and a range of (internal and external) organisational documents.

In our analyses we draw on two different kinds of discourse, namely participants' authentic workplace discourse (in particular, meeting discourse) and their comments and reflections gathered through interviews. In particular, we approach identity construction from two different but complementary perspectives, namely i) the ways in which interlocutors portray themselves as adapting to, negotiating or rejecting the new culture in which they work and live; and ii) the ways in which these perceived identity construction processes are actually reflected in interlocutors' workplace discourse. As Fairhurst (2007: 113) maintains, 'identity comes to be defined both by the way individuals act and what they say about themselves'. Thus, combining participants' everyday workplace discourse with their reflections on their experiences in working in multicultural workplaces promises to provide valuable insights into the multi-faceted picture of the complex (and often contradictory) processes involved in identity construction in organisational settings.

3.1. Background of the participants

The main participants in this study are UK expatriates who have been residing in Hong Kong for various periods of time ranging from a few years to several decades. Interestingly, the insights that our participants provided about their professional experiences of working in multicultural teams in Hong Kong displayed consistent similarities regardless of the amount of time that they have spent in Hong Kong. We briefly introduce our participants before analysing extracts of their discourse.

Janet³, the owner of a language teaching company, has arrived in Hong Kong nearly thirty years ago. First employed as an English teacher at the British Council, she later established her own company, Lingsoft Inc. Currently the company has 15 employees who are all Hong Kong Chinese with the exception of Janet.

Tobias, a managing director of a large telecommunication company, Telenor, has been living in different parts of Asia for over 10 years, and prior to that he was working in the UK but travelling to Asia regularly on business trips. At the time of data collection he managed more than 1000 employees. Most of his staff are local Hong Kong Chinese, but also include some expatriates from around the world.

Our other participant, Susan, has been residing in Hong Kong for a comparatively short period of time, namely for 2.5 years. Prior to that she lived and worked in Australia. Susan is the Head of one of the departments in a major international financial corporation, Company K. Her team is comprised of 30 people, and they include both Hong Kong Chinese and expatriate members.

However, although our participants are all expatriates and although their experiences (as reflected in their comments in the interviews) are to some extent similar, we do not want to suggest that they form a homogenous or monolithic group (see also Nair-Venugopal 2009). Nor do we want to claim that they merely ‘represent the cultures they belong to’ (Nair-Venugopal 2009: 77), rather, we aim to illustrate some of the ways in which our participants make culture an issue in their workplace discourse and how their conceptualisations of culture contribute to constructing and negotiating their professional and their cultural identities in the context of their multicultural workplaces.

4. Constructing professional identities in multicultural workplaces: An analysis

In our analysis of seven examples of authentic workplace discourse and interview discourse we explore how expatriate professionals in three different multicultural workplaces construct their professional identities as expatriate leaders in their respective organisations. Our particular focus is on two aspects repeatedly mentioned by the participants in our study: sharing decision making power among team members and maintaining a work-life balance.

4.1 Sharing decision making power

In the interviews all our participants commented on significant differences in the expectations of what constitutes ‘effective’ leadership behaviour among expatriate leaders and local Hong Kong Chinese subordinates. The general perception was that while Western⁴ notions of doing

³ All participants and the companies they work for have been assigned pseudonyms. We would like to thank all participants for taking part in this project.

⁴ Although we are aware that the labels ‘Western’ and ‘Asian’ are rather ambiguous and can be used to refer to a vast number of cultures and languages (for further discussion see leadership often involve attempts to share responsibilities and decision making power (for example, by involving team members in these processes), non-Western notions of leadership centre around subordinates' expectation to be led, not to question authority, and to be only minimally involved in decision making processes (see also Chee & West 2004; Cullen 1999; House et al. 2004).

These different perceptions are perhaps not surprising given that culture seems to be one of the most prominent factors that have an impact on defining 'the array of preferred and acceptable leader behaviours' (Cullen 1999: 527; see also Guirdham 2005). Different expectations about appropriate ways of doing leadership are often linked to culture-specific values, and as a consequence, effective leaders are portrayed very differently. In high power distance cultures, for example, such as Hong Kong, superiors are typically seen as 'benevolent autocrat' or 'good father'. More senior people are expected to be faithful and caring while more junior staff are expected to be loyal and obedient (Redding 1990; Westwood 1992; Selmer and de Leon 2003). In cultures with low power distance, on the other hand, such as, for example, the UK and Australia, leaders are often viewed as a 'resourceful democrat' (Hofstede 1995: 151) who takes into account the views of their subordinates. However, a study by Wong et al. (2007) of leadership styles in construction sites in Hong Kong indicates that such differences in leadership perception and power relations are considerably less pronounced in multicultural workplaces. In contrast to their hypotheses based on previous intercultural research, the researchers did not find significant differences in the ways in which Western and local Hong Kong Chinese managers perceived themselves. Nevertheless, despite remarkable similarities in leadership perception between Western and Chinese managers, Wong et al (2007: 102) also mention that their results 'revealed some deep-rooted cultural values and beliefs [which] were not easily altered' and which may impact participants' leadership behaviour. It thus seems that culture does play a role at some level.

We have chosen four examples to illustrate how two of our participants, Susan and Janet, conceptualise and actually enact the processes of decision making and exercising power with the members of their teams. Examples 1 and 2 are taken from the interviews with the leaders and examples 3 and 4 are from their daily workplace interactions.

(1) Context: Interview after data collection with Susan, the Head of one of the departments in a major international financial corporation, company K.
R – Researcher; S – Susan

1. R: [...] if you could just tell us a little bit about your leadership style ?
2. S: What changed me (.) I swore I'd never let this happen because when I arrived,
3. I saw people, I saw managers and senior managers and partners doing things
4. that I thought were really really not (.) not appropriate and quite a dictatorial
5. style and definitely (.) power (.) use, and powers came from (.), it was
6. positional power. People are supposed to be using expert power . So I, you
7. know, the use of relational power, I don't think it's effective. Um, and coming
8. to China (.) what I realized is that the culture (.) requires you in a way to do
9. this, it actually requires you to act in ways that as a Westerner, foreigner, you
10. find um, um, (.) surprising. I don't think I'll have any difficulty when I return
11. to work in other cultures. (.) But you're always expected to act that way. If you
12. don't, it confuses people, I think. It confuses the Chinese people who are Bargiela-Chiappini 2005), we use these two terms in a generic sense to juxtapose the two contexts.

13. working for you. And I think what I learnt was that, um, (.) that it worries the
14. Chinese employees if you don't act this way. They actually don't know what
15. to do if you don't use the hierarchical or positional power. Um, and they
16. become worried and concerned and I call it, I call it "the worried Chinese
17. look" which is "Oh my god, she's not doing what should be doing." So you are
18. forced in a way to change your management style and I find that odd. But then
19. you have to do, what you have to do.

In the interview Susan emphasises the impact of cultural expectations on the ways in which people (including others and herself) do leadership. She recounts how she was surprised to find Western 'managers and senior managers and partners' display leadership behaviour which she considered to be 'really really not (.) not appropriate and quite a dictatorial style' (lines 4 and 5). She particularly comments on what she describes as culturally-motivated differences in exercising power (lines 5-7): while Western cultures often appreciate expert power, i.e. power which derives from an individual's 'knowledge, aptitude, and ability' (Dwyer, 1993: 557; French & Raven 1959), Eastern cultures, on the other hand, tend to value position power, i.e. power that is based on an individual's position in an organisation (Northouse 1997, French & Raven 1959).

However, what is particularly interesting about Susan's comments is that she explicitly describes culture as having an impact on the leadership performance of expatriates: 'the culture requires you in a way to do this, but actually requires you to act in ways that as a Westerner, foreigner, you find um, um, surprising' (lines 8-10). Thus, in her view, in order to do leadership effectively in the multicultural context in which she works, she feels required to act in ways that are in accordance with the expectations of her local Hong Kong Chinese staff and which may often be in conflict with her own (Western) ideals of doing leadership and exercising power. In particular, as she describes, in order to prevent her subordinates from being confused and worried (lines 12-17) she tends to adapt her leadership style to their expectations (lines 17-19). And although she does not seem to enjoy these Chinese ways of doing things (as is reflected, for example, in her choice of words 'forced to change' (line 17), and 'odd' (line 18)), she seems rather pragmatic about it: 'you have to do what you have to do' (lines 18-19).

In the interview, then, Susan describes a close link between the ways in which she constructs herself as a leader and the opposing cultural expectations that she perceives: she portrays herself as having to negotiate her own (Western) ideals of exercising power with the expectations of her Chinese staff. And perhaps even more than that: not only does she negotiate culturally influenced norms and practices but it almost seems as though she is adopting Chinese ways of doing things in spite of her reluctance. In this excerpt (and throughout the interview) she thus portrays herself as an expatriate who is 'forced' (line 18) to adhere to the norms and expectations of the culture she works in at the expense of what she believes to be 'appropriate' to her own culturally influenced ways of conceptualising leadership. However, as we will see in example 3 below, in the actual reality of doing leadership on a day-to-day basis with her local Hong Kong Chinese staff, culture seems to be much less of an issue and Susan's leadership performance effectively combines elements of both Western and Chinese ideals of doing leadership.

The next example is taken from the interview with Janet, the owner of a language teaching company, Lingsoft Inc. In describing her leadership style, Janet comments on similar issues as Susan.

(2) R – Researcher; J – Janet

1. R: How would you describe your leadership style?

2. J: Um (2.1) I would describe that- (1) two main aspects of it (.) one is um (1.2)
3. essentially trying to get the democracy (.) going in the office, doesn't work a
4. hundred percent because I'm working with Chinese people, um but that (.) that
5. would be my ultimate goal is that they work fully as a team and they they're
6. fully democratic in the decision making hmm but having said that um (.) that
7. doesn't work, so that I get quite (frustrated).

When asked how she would describe her leadership style Janet portrays herself as a democratic leader who puts great emphasis on empowering and involving her subordinates in decision making processes (lines 3-6). However, she also acknowledges that these Western ideals of doing leadership (in particular, the notions of empowerment and participatory decision making) may not be the most effective in the context in which she operates. She explicitly mentions that she works 'with Chinese people' (line 4) which she perceives as having an impact on her leadership performance: rather than being able to achieve her 'ultimate goal' (line 5) of democratic or participative leadership, Janet seems to struggle (as she admits in line 7) to combine her Western ideals of doing leadership with the reality of working with people from another culture. In the interview, then, Janet constructs her professional identity as a leader by showing her awareness of what she perceives to be tensions between Western ideals and Chinese expectations of leadership: she positions herself in-between the antagonistic discourses of democracy and empowerment on the one hand and Chinese expectations (which she does not elaborate in more detail here) on the other.

What is interesting in Susan's and Janet's accounts is the observation that in both cases participants mention culture or, more specifically, different cultural expectations as having a considerable impact on their leadership style – although we did not specifically ask about culture in this question. There thus seems to be a strong belief among participants that culture has a crucial impact on how they do leadership and how they construct their professional identities as leaders in the multicultural workplace in which they work.

We now look at two examples of how Susan and Janet actually do leadership in their everyday working lives. The examples are instances of decision making taken from weekly meetings between the leaders and their local staff.

(3) Context: This is a weekly meeting of the administrative team of Susan's (S) Department. The meeting is chaired by Cheryl (C), a Senior Administrator, who is also the team leader. The third participant in the extract is Julia (J) who works as an Administrator. The participants are discussing problems with the room-booking caused by changes in the schedules of the training courses they organize for Company K's employees.

1. C: Do we have any:: changes, I understand that we might be some changes on the
2. ((name of the course)) schedule, is this still needs many amendments?
3. J: Hmm hmm a:h actually I have received some amendments yesterday but ah it
4. just a minor amendments (.) it should, it should be Okay.
5. C: Hmm hmm can you book, can you change the room with your revised time
6. table?
7. J: Ahhh I'm err I'm looking for the rooms but ahh ahh need to update it and check
8. it with Angela later on.
9. C: Hmm hmm
10. J: Hmm
11. S: Okay, if we need to reschedule some management skills programmes to meet
12. your need, then you'll let me know, then we'll figure it out.
13. J: Hmm, okay. Thank you.

14. C: Okay.

This example illustrates how decisions are typically made in Susan's team. And while there is a lot to say about this example we concentrate here on Susan's performance. At first Susan does not actively participate in the discussion (lines 1-10) but leaves the negotiations to Cheryl, the team leader and chair of the meeting. Susan then joins the discussion in line 11 in what seems to be an attempt to clarify matters and bring the negotiations to an end. The utterance initial 'Okay' (line 11) indicates that the discussion is reaching a new stage and that a topic is about to be closed (Fung & Carter 2007). What is particularly interesting is Susan's use of pronouns when formulating the ultimate decision: she uses the inclusive pronoun 'we' to signal that the issue under discussion is a group problem which needs to be solved in a conjoint effort ('we'll figure it out' (line 12)), but she also uses 'you' to specifically address Julia who is responsible for the schedule changes. Interestingly, Susan uses the first person pronoun 'me' in 'you'll let me know' (line 12) thereby positioning herself as being ultimately the one who is in charge of the team's performance. She thereby takes over part of the responsibility and portrays herself as the leader of the team (for a more detailed discussion of the ways in which Susan and Cheryl share leadership roles see Schnurr & Zayts fc). However, Susan's display of power and authority in portraying herself as the most important person responsible for dealing with this issue is mitigated to some extent by her final comment 'we'll figure it out' (line 12). The use of the inclusive 'we' in this utterance once more stresses that finding a solution should be a team effort.

This short extract is a good example of how Susan shares decision making power with the other members of her team: she typically keeps herself in the background and lets her team members discuss the issues first. Susan tends to join these discussions when they get stuck or when a final decision needs to be reached. Often she is the one to formulate and thereby ratify the decision that her subordinates have made. In this way, her leadership performance as reflected in the actual workplace (i.e. meeting) discourse, draws on elements associated with a Chinese or more autocratic leadership style, such as portraying herself as the most important person and doing power overtly (e.g. by ratifying the decision) while also employing elements indexed for a Western or more democratic and participatory leadership style (e.g. by playing only a minor role in the discussions and finding solutions that lead to the decision). Susan thus seems to have found ways of combining elements of leadership behaviours in her performance that are associated with 'effective' leadership in both Western and Chinese cultures: she displays her power and position overtly while also encouraging and requesting active participation of her subordinates in the decision making processes. In her everyday workplace discourse Susan thus portrays herself as a confident leader who has found ways of doing leadership that take into consideration and combine the different, culturally specific expectations of the people she works with and of herself.

The next example is taken from a weekly meeting at Lingsoft Inc. and illustrates how Janet and her team make decisions.

(4) Context: This is a weekly meeting of the administrative team of Lingsoft Inc. Participants in the conversation include Janet (J), the head of the company and chair of the meeting, Valerie (V) and Ivan (I), two employees. Lingsoft Inc. offers English tutoring in some public schools in Hong Kong, and the participants are discussing running new English classes in a particular school.

1. J: Either we (.) suggest the minimum numbers to our students, (.) or we ask for
2. the price.
3. V: Yes.
4. J: Or we have two prices, one for groups of, say, six. (0.6) Or is that gonna be

5. too complicated?
6. V: That's too complicated for the parents.
7. I: Yeah, that'll be too complicated, yeah.
8. J: Okay. ° Okay.°
9. (0.4)
10. V: Why not just try one thousand five hundred for ten sections (). I think they,
11. they can afford.
12. I: For all (.) for all class, right? For all class, for all class, okay.
13. V: If they don't have, any similar organization provide (.) English teaching, I
14. think, should be alright. Because we just compare of, of other subject. Piano
15. or swim, ah! Not piano. Swimming or some o-other I-other interest course.
16. J: So what are you suggesting Vicky? One?
17. V: One thousand five hundred for ten sections.
18. J: Oh! One thousand five hundred fo- instead of?
19. V: One thousand for ten sections. Now they are paying one thousand for ten
20. section and we got seventy percent. (.)
21. J: If we, if we, if we lose, if we lose thirty percent, what's thirty percent of
22. fifteen?
23. V: I don't know.
24. J: So we
25. I: Seventy percent, one hundred and fifteen.
26. V: One hundred- U:h, one hundred and five ah.
27. J: One hundred and five. Okay, so we get a little. hhhhh. Okay.

In contrast to Susan, Janet is clearly leading the discussion in this excerpt. She plays a very active role in finding a solution: she offers different solutions to her subordinates (see for example the 'either or' constructions in lines 1-2, 4-5), she asks clarifying questions (e.g. lines 16 and 18) and she specifically requests feedback (e.g. lines 4-5) thereby actively involving the other team members. The other members of her team seem happy to be involved in the decision making process and actively participate in finding a solution: they offer their views (e.g. lines 6 and 7) which Janet takes on board (line 8) and they provide alternative suggestions (lines 10 and 11). However, in the end, it is Janet who summarises the outcome of the decision (line 27) and who signals that the discussion has come to an end (see her repeated use of 'Okay').

In this example Janet portrays herself as a democratic leader who puts great emphasis on empowering and including her team members in the decision making processes. This leadership style – in particular the emphasis on sharing power – is, as discussed above, in line with Western ideals of doing leadership. Thus, in contrast to Janet's comment in the interviews that this kind of democratic or participative leadership style 'does not work' in the context of her workplace, this example nicely illustrates the opposite: in this decision making episode at least all participants contribute to the discussion and a solution is found conjointly. However, although the overall discussion is clearly a collaborative effort, there is at the same time little doubt about the fact that Janet is the one in charge: she displays a range of behaviours indexed for leadership, such as asking clarifying questions, and she is the one who summarises the outcome of the discussion and who has the last word on this matter.

In the next section we focus on another topic that was mentioned repeatedly in the interviews with the expatriate leaders, namely maintaining a work-life balance. Like sharing decision making power, practices to balance work requirements and personal life seem to be culturally influenced and play a role in how our participants construct and negotiate their professional identities in their multicultural workplaces.

4.2 Maintaining a work-life balance

Finding and maintaining a balance between work and personal life is an issue that has been identified by many expatriate participants in our corpus. Most of them have specifically commented on the norm in their Hong Kong workplaces to work late (and overtime) on a regular basis. Indeed, Hong Kong employees are known for working long hours at the expense of time spent on their private lives: A recent survey commissioned by an NGO in Hong Kong showed that Hong Kong employees are working 48.4 hours a week on average which, according to the survey, 'is 21% higher than the 40 hours recommended by the International Labour Organisation.' (Ng & Bernier 2009: 2)

Regular long work hours are an issue for many expatriates who come to Hong Kong after having worked in other (often Western) cultures: in the vast majority of our interviews with expatriates this issue was brought up by participants. And often this aspect of workplace realities in Hong Kong is perceived as being a crucial part of the local culture which is '[c]haracterised by an immigrant population, whose hard work and determination transformed Hong Kong from a small fishing village on the edge of the South China Sea into the economic powerhouse it is viewed as today.' (Vernon 2009: 6) Thus, working hard (as typically measured in the long hours spent at the workplace) is often believed to be one of the reasons for Hong Kong's economic success.

We have chosen three examples here that are representative of the data we have collected to illustrate how our expatriate participants perceive this aspect of Hong Kong's culture. Our particular focus is on the ways in which the issue of work-life balance is perceived as playing a role in participants' professional lives and how it impacts on their professional identities.

(5) Context: Interview with Tobias, the managing director of a major local company providing telecommunication services, Telenor.

1. R: Any interesting experiences, any cultural shocks? ehrrrrrr
2. T: Well yeah, the first thing that was evident for me, and remember that I'd been
3. coming to Hong Kong for many years before that, was coming four times-
4. (or) five five times a year on business trips, so I really knew this anyway, but
5. you know the evident thing was that people seemed to work very long hours,
6. but they didn't really, they spent most of the day (.) actually not being very
7. productive working in a way which was being to do with people networking-
8. making sure people understood, yududuhduhduh and then they sort of came to
9. the realization around four or five o'clock that they hadn't done any work and
10. then spend the next four hours working, so that's why they didn't leave the
11. office before nine o'clock
12. R: Do you think it applies to both locals and expats? eh
13. T No
14. R: Expatriates or mainly local?
15. T: Local (.) local, I mean you know in due course expats may be sucked into it, I
16. guess, because often if you talk to Chinese about expat (.) work behavior, they
17. express some surprise >you know< he gets in at seven o'clock in the morning
18. and leaves at five, (.) this type of stuff, he gets in at seven and works for three
19. hours before anybody else turns up
20. ((3 turns are omitted))
21. T: So I think whilst these are sweeping generalizations, massive generalizations,

22. there is a different work culture
23. R: It's interesting that these long hours come up time, after time, after time, when
24. we talk to people (.)
25. T: But it's not productive, long hours, it's highly unproductive, (long hours), and
26. you start to live with it, you're not going to change this enormous culture,
27. that's just what it is, and the thing, I think you asked me about tips for
28. newcomers, the first thing I would tell newcomers is to learn the art of
29. patience, it's really important, cause you know what? the outcome that you
30. want, if you manage it well, it will, will come. It just may come in a route that
31. you don't expect it or in a way that you don't expect it, so when these people
32. out here in my office set out to do something, to achieve something, they
33. almost invariably achieve it, still achieve it in the way that I might have
34. considered to do it fourteen years ago. Now, you know, I often think, yeah
35. they'll be doing what they do best and they'll get to the right results. So you
36. know, you have to be adaptable, obviously.

In this example Tobias positions himself in opposition to 'these people out there in my office' (lines 31 and 32), i.e. to the Hong Kong local staff who work for him. He describes some of the working practices of 'these people' (in particular, regularly working long hours) as resulting from 'a different work culture' (line 22). In the beginning of this extract Tobias is very critical about what he considers to be the norm in Hong Kong, namely to work long hours (e.g. lines 5-11, 25). And while he acknowledges that his perceptions are 'sweeping generalisations, massive generalisations' (lines 21 and 22) he makes it very clear that he considers this kind of behaviour to be 'highly unproductive' (lines 25, 6-7).

However, in spite of having some reservations about these practices of his local staff, Tobias also acknowledges that they are part of the local culture and that he needs to find ways of accepting if not adapting to these different ways of doing things: 'you start to live with it, you're not going to change this enormous culture, that's just what it is' (lines 26-27, 36). And towards the end of this extract Tobias even seems to change his tune a little and to almost adopt a 'different but equal' discourse describing cultural expectations and practices as different but equally valid. This discourse stands in contrast to his earlier comments about the unproductivity of local practices. Towards the end he almost seems to revise his original claims to some extent and he maintains that the ways things are done by his Hong Kong local staff may differ from his expectations but they are still leading to good results 'they'll be doing what they do best and they'll get to the right results.' (line 35).

In this episode, then, Tobias portrays himself as an expatriate leader of a team of Hong Kong locals who seems to experience some tensions between his own (Western influenced) ideals of best and most productive practices on the one hand, and the norms of the local Hong Kong culture as reflected in the practices of the people he works with, on the other hand. It is in this perceived tension that he negotiates his professional identity as an expatriate leader by drawing on the almost stereotypical discourses of 'adapting to the other culture' (e.g. line 36), 'being patient' (line 29), and 'different but equal cultural practices' (lines 30-36), while at the same time expressing his frustration with some cultural differences (this frustration is also reflected in other parts of the interview, for example when Tobias talks about the 'culture of hierarchy' within the company and with clients; or when he complains about his staff not strategizing their actions, or, as he puts it, 'not thinking beyond the next action they need to take').

In the next example, Susan reflects on the issue of working long hours.

(6) Context: Interview with Susan, the Head of one of the departments in a major international financial corporation, Company K.

1. S: Every country is different. Each partnership is different.
2. So, you do have a radically different em working environment.
3. I mean I (would think of) a beautiful story I have (just to summarize this).
4. I (worked) with the China team (who was) complaining about one of the
5. Australians ((inaudible)). They're saying oh you know he gets to six thirty, you
6. know, he leaves. And I said oh (did he complete his work)? Yeh yeh he has
7. completed his work. So why shouldn't he leave? Oh no, you should stay back (.)
8. and be with the team 'cause the rest of the team is working. That's to do things
9. in China. And I, to me, I find that quite amusing yeh. Finished his work, and it's
10. done, what you're meant to do? But you shouldn't leave because the people in
11. the team haven't done. So you should be there and you should stay at work. (.)
12. That summarizes the difference. In Australia, everyone leaves at whatever time.
13. You finish your work, it's done.

In this example Susan tells a short anecdote to illustrate how her Western ideals of work-life balance have clashed with the expectations and practices of some Chinese people she worked with some time ago in Australia: the members of the Chinese team were surprised to see a member of the Australian team leave once he had finished his work. According to the expectations of the Chinese team 'you should stay back and be with the team 'cause the rest of the team is working' (lines 7-8). Susan (like Tobias) perceives these differences in working hours to be rooted in cultural expectations and norms (lines 8 and 9). And indeed, these differences have often been explained by reference to the cultural dimension of individualism versus collectivism (Hofstede 1980): working long hours and staying in the office until the last person has finished his/her task can be seen as an expression of the high collectivism in the Chinese culture which values cooperation, interdependence, and group harmony (Wong et al. 2007: 96).

In telling this little story, then, Susan portrays her professional identity as a team leader (of an Australian-Chinese team) who is aware of but at the same time amused by (line 9) cultural differences regarding working hours. In her account she sets up a relatively explicit and distinct subject position for herself almost in opposition to her Chinese colleagues. She thus not only portrays herself as a leader but as someone who believes in Western values and practices, including flexible working hours and employee independence and responsibility for their work. As we will see in the next example, the issue of work-life balance also comes up in the authentic workplace data that we have collected in Susan's department: work-life balance seems to be an issue that she is very passionate about and that she wants to improve for her team.

The next example shows Susan talking to her second-in-command, Cheryl, about implementing shorter working hours for the administrative team.

(7) Context: This is a one-to-one meeting between Susan (S) and Cheryl (C). Cheryl is a Hong Kong Chinese and has just taken over the leadership role for the administrative team in the department that Susan is heading. In the conversation Susan mentions Peter who is Susan's boss.

1. S: .hh I'm- I'm- still I kno:w that people work: (.) quite long, I know that people
2. work longer hours, I'm just wondering hmm (.) because over time it's harder to
3. prove, is there anything that we can do: I'm thinking, if peop-, if people don't
4. have a programme=
5. C: =Hmm
6. S: (.) because we know they are going to stay past five thirty, °we know they're

7. probably going to stay till six o'clock°
8. C: Hmm
9. S: It's your choice, it's your team, but >if people don't have a programme< do you
10. want to start them at nine o'clock?
11. C: °Hmmhm° mhm uhmmm, if they do not have a programme you mean (.) uhm
12. wu- wu- wu- whether I feel happy to let them=
13. S: =start at [nine o'clock]
14. C: [start at nine] o'clock
15. S: Because we know they don't leave at five thirty
16. C: >hmhmm hmhm<
17. S: We know, most people=
18. C: =hmhmm
19. S: Most evenings leave, a quarter to [six, six] o'clock=
20. C: [Hmm hmm]
21. ((8 turns are omitted))
22. S: Maybe we can start at nine o'clock and people can then st- finish their normal=
23. C: =hmm
24. S: quarter to six- six o'clock, what do you think [will that work]
25. C: I think it's a good idea
26. S: Yeah
27. C: But I don't know (where) to appro::ach our (inaudible)
28. S: IF you want me to do that,
29. C: Hmm
30. S: I will organise it with Peter.

Talking to Cheryl about ways of cutting down the working hours of team members, Susan makes work-life balance an issue in her everyday workplace interactions. And although culture is not explicitly mentioned in this extract, the close link between her team's behaviour and culturally influenced perceptions of regularly working long hours are well motivated by Susan's comments and explanations in the interview (see example 6).

Although there is a lot to say about what is happening in this example, our focus here is on how Susan discusses the issue of long working hours with Cheryl. She starts by stating that 'people work quite long' (line 1). After having repeated this fact (line 2) the illocutionary force of this utterance is mitigated considerably throughout her next utterances, for example by starting to provide an explanation for her concerns (lines 3 and 4), and by repeatedly using the inclusive pronoun 'we' to signal that she and Cheryl are on the same side. In line 9, then, Susan explicitly emphasises Cheryl's responsibility of this issue: 'it's your choice', and she directly asks her what she thinks about a possible solution (namely to let people start their workday later) (lines 9 and 10). When Cheryl does not immediately provide an answer Susan repeats her previous arguments and suggestion (lines 15-22). However, Cheryl still only produces minimal replies in answering her boss's questions. In line 24, then, Susan utters a direct question in which she explicitly asks Cheryl for feedback on her suggestion: 'do you think will that work'. Cheryl's reply is positive ('I think it's a good idea' (line 25)) and receives approval from Susan ('yeah' (line 26)). After having agreed to Susan's suggestion, however, Cheryl mentions the problem of how to put Susan's suggestion into practice (line 27), which is then solved by Susan who takes over this responsibility by offering to organise a programme that will help implement shorter working hours.

In this extract Susan skilfully constructs and negotiates her professional identity while paying particular attention to allowing Cheryl to play a role in the decision making. In particular, rather than simply telling Cheryl what to do, Susan spends some time convincing and almost guiding her through the decision. In doing this Susan displays a wide range of behaviours typically associated with a participative leadership style, such as making sure that decisions are reached by consensus rather than being implemented from above. Her behaviours thus reflect elements of Western ideals of leadership, such as empowering subordinates and sharing decision making power (as discussed above). Moreover, Susan's behaviour in this example almost resembles that of a mother who acts in the best interest of her children (here: team members) and who wants them to make their own decisions in ways which she believes are in their best interest. Like a mother, Susan thus portrays herself as caring for the wellbeing of her staff members (who are regularly working long hours) while at the same time being very clear about what she considers to be the best solution for this problem. And constructing herself as a mother, as someone who is caring while also holding a powerful and authoritarian position, enables her to position herself in ways that combine Western and Chinese expectations of appropriate leadership behaviour.

5. Discussion & conclusion

The aim of this paper was to explore how the professional identities of expatriates who live and work in Hong Kong are constructed and negotiated in multicultural workplaces in ways that reflect participants' culturally influenced assumptions, expectations, values and practices. A particular focus was on the complex interplay between the processes of adapting to, negotiating and rejecting aspects of culture, and its impact on constructing professional identities.

We have looked at examples from participants' interview discourse providing valuable insights into their self-perception and interpretation of the situation. Insights gained from this data source were then complemented by participants' workplace discourse which illustrated how interlocutors actually construct their professional identities in their everyday workplace encounters when interacting with people from different socio-cultural backgrounds. Our particular focus was on two aspects that repeatedly came up in the interviews with participants, namely sharing decision making power and maintaining a work-life balance.

In the interviews our participants emphasised the impact of cultural expectations on their leadership behaviour, and described how they have to negotiate their own Western influenced ideals of doing leadership with those of the local culture. One of the themes that came through in all the interviews was the difficulties our expatriate leaders experienced with sharing decision making power with their subordinates. We have argued that it is in this perceived tension of having to juggle the sometimes opposing expectations of 'effective' leadership that participants constantly construct and negotiate their professional identities as 'effective' leaders.

Similar observations were made with regards to the topic of maintaining a work-life balance. In the interviews our participants commented on various issues they have with dealing with the expectations and practices of their local staff regarding working long hours. These practices were typically directly associated with cultural differences. Through evaluating these culturally influenced practices in the interviews, participants positioned themselves in relation to this 'other' culture in complex ways: they not only constructed local practices as 'different' but they also partly rejected and partly accepted them (e.g. example 5). Thus, through these processes participants actively constructed their professional and their cultural identities in relation to the wider socio-cultural contexts in which they act: they typically portray themselves as non-members of the local culture who have to find ways of dealing with various cultural practices and expectations.

What is perhaps surprising in our data is that although Holliday (2010: 175) notes that ‘individuals can have the capacity to feel a belonging to several cultural realities simultaneously’, in the interviews participants took a clear stance as not belonging to the Hong Kong host culture. Rather, they typically positioned themselves in opposition to the local culture, for example by evaluating cultural practices, by creating ‘us’ and ‘them’ subject positions, and by making explicit reference to the ‘other’ culture. Thus, in contrast to the Western expatriate managers that Wong et al (2007) interviewed, our participants did not consciously attempt to adopt elements of the Hong Kong local culture in order to be successful. Rather, they typically positioned themselves in opposition to local practices or they portrayed themselves as being forced to adopt them, as Susan and Tobias commented in their interviews.

These self-portrayals of participants in the interviews, however, were complemented, and to some extent put into perspective by an analysis of their everyday workplace discourse. A detailed analysis of the ways in which participants actually interact with their Hong Kong Chinese team members indicated that culture was much less of an issue than claimed in the interviews. In particular, in all the examples that we looked at participants seemed to have found ways of constructing their professional identities as leaders by skilfully combining both their own Western and their subordinates’ Chinese expectations and norms. They have found ways of being empowering and encouraging their subordinates’ participation in decision making processes while also displaying aspects of more authoritarian leadership styles. In these ways our participants managed to portray themselves as ‘effective’ leaders in ways that work in different socio-cultural contexts. In particular, when actually interacting with their Hong Kong local team members our expatriates were not caught in this static tension of conflicting demands but managed to carefully negotiate and combine the various culturally influenced elements of leadership behaviour: in the decision making episodes, for example, they portrayed themselves as being empowering and encouraging others’ participation while at the same time displaying and reinforcing their own position as the most powerful person.

These differences between participant’s comments and self-reflections in the interviews and the complex ways in which they actually behaved in their daily encounters with members from another culture clearly demonstrate the usefulness of combining different types of data. And although obtaining actual workplace discourse is often a challenging task (e.g. Du-Babcock & Babcock 1996), the kinds of insights gained through an analysis of what people actually do (in addition to what they say they do) are not only informative about the complexities of identity construction but are also likely to provide valuable information about a wide range of other processes that take place in a workplace setting.

Based on our observations of the various processes involved in identity construction, then, we would argue that professional identities are always to some extent influenced by cultural expectations, assumptions and values of interlocutors. We would even propose that, at least in multicultural contexts, such as the ones we have looked at, professional identities and cultural identities are interlinked with each other in complex ways, which ultimately means that there are no ‘culture-free’ professional identities. Rather, professional identities are constructed and negotiated in ways that always to some extent consider the culturally influenced perceptions and expectations of participants. Thus, the ways in which people, for example, do leadership and construct themselves as more or less democratic or autocratic leaders, are influenced by culturally influenced assumptions of what constitutes ‘effective’ leadership. In cases where these assumptions are in conflict, participants need to find ways of negotiating these conflicting demands and combining different expectations. This dilemma may be solved, as we have shown, for example, by drawing on and adapting identities or roles that work well in different cultures, such as the role of a mother (which combines authoritarian and empowering behaviours).

However, our study was exploratory in nature and has only looked at the discourses of three expatriate leaders in Hong Kong. Clearly, more research is necessary to further explore the complexities of identity construction in multicultural contexts. In particular, multicultural workplaces, where different culturally influenced expectations, norms, values and practices are enacted and made relevant on a daily basis, promise to be particularly rich sites for investigations into the complex interplay between identity construction and culture.

Transcription conventions

(.)	noticeable pause shorter than 0.5 second (including regular pauses between sentences)
.	falling intonation
,	level intonation
?	rising intonation
°XXX°	words are said softer than the surrounding items (not limited to the ending/onset position; can be anywhere in an utterance)
[the beginning of overlapping
]	the end of overlapping
A: XXX=	B's utterance is latched onto A's
B: =XXX
A: XX[XX]XXX=	means line 3 is a continuation of A's utterance in line 1
B: [XX]
A: =XXXX
:	lengthened sound (more colons mean greater length)
> <	words uttered at a faster pace
< >	words uttered at a slower pace
XXX	words said with an emphasis
XXX	stressed words
Ehh, hhh	laughter particles
()	transcriber's best guess of uttered words
(())	non-verbal features or transcriber's comment

References

- Angouri, J. and M. Marra, Eds. (fc). Constructing Identities at Work. Houndmills, Palgrave.
- Brooks, A. (2004). Changing work identities for professional women in Hong Kong. Old challenges, new strategies : women, work, and family in contemporary Asia L. L. Thang and W.-H. Yu. Leiden ; Boston Brill: 145-162.
- Chan, A. (2005). Managing business meetings in different workplace cultures. Wellington, Victoria University of Wellington, New Zealand.
- Chee, H. and C. West (2004). Myths about Doing Business in China. Houndmills, MacMillan.
- Cheng, W. (2003). Intercultural Conversation. Amsterdam, Benjamins.
- Collier, M. J. (2005). Theorizing cultural identifications. Theorizing About Intercultural Communication. W. Gudykunst. London, Sage: 235-256.
- Collier, M. J. and M. Thomas (1988). Cultural identity. Theories of Intercultural Communication. Y. Y. Kim and W. Gudykunst. Newbury Park, CA, Sage: 99-120.
- Cullen, J. B. (1999). Multinational Management. A Strategic Approach. Cincinnati, Ohio, South-Western Publishing.
- Cupach, W. and T. T. Imahori (1993). Identity management theory. Intercultural Communication Competence. R. Wiseman and J. Koester. Newbury Park, CA, Sage: 112-131.
- Du-Babcock, B. and R. Babcock (1996). Patterns of expatriate-local personnel communication in multinational corporations. The Journal of Business Communication 33(2): 141-164.

- Dwyer, J. (1993). The Business Communication Handbook. New York, Prentice Hall.
- Ellemers, N., A. Haslam, et al. (2003). Social identity at work: developments, debates, directions. Social Identity at Work: Developing Theory for Organizational Practice. A. Haslam, D. van Knippenberg, M. Platow and N. Ellemers. New York and Hove, Psychology Press: 3-28.
- Fairhurst, G. T. (2007). Discursive leadership: in conversation with leadership psychology. Thousand Oaks, California, Sage Publications, Inc.
- Fougere, M. (2009). Adaptation and identity. Culturally Speaking. Managing Rapport Through Talk Across Cultures. H. Spencer-Oatey. London, Continuum: 187-203.
- French, J. and B. Raven (1959). The bases of social power. Studies in Social Power. D. Cartwright. Ann Arbor, The University of Michigan.
- Fung, L. and R. Carter (2007). Discourse markers and spoken English: Native and learner use in pedagogic settings. Applied Linguistics 28(3): 410-439.
- Glenn, P.G. (2003). Laughter in interaction. Cambridge, Cambridge University Press.
- Gudykunst, W., C. Lee, et al. (2005). Theorizing about intercultural communication. Theorizing About Intercultural Communication. W. Gudykunst. London, Sage: 3-32.
- Guirdham, M. (2005). Communicating across cultures at work (ed.). New York, Palgrave Macmillan.
- Hall, C., S. Sarangi, S. Slembrouck. (1999). The legitimation of the client and the profession: Identities and roles in social work discourse. Talk, Work and Institutional Order. Discourse in Medical, Mediation and Management Settings. S. Sarangi and C. Roberts. Berlin, deGruyter: 293-321.
- Hall, S. (2000). Who needs identity? Identity: A Reader. P. Du Gay, J. Evans and P. Redman. London, Sage: 15-30.
- Hall, S. and P. du Gay, Eds. (1996). Questions of Identity. London, Sage.
- Hecht, M. (1993). 2002 - A research odyssey toward the development of a communication theory of identity. Communication Monographs 60: 76-82.
- Hecht, M., J. Warren, E. Jung, J. Krieger. (2005). The communication theory of identity. Theorizing About Intercultural Communication. W. Gudykunst. London, Sage: 257-278.
- Hofstede, Geert (1980). Cultures and Organizations. International Studies of Management & Organizations 10(4): 15-41.
- Hofstede, Geert (1995). The business of international business is culture. In Cross-Cultural Management, Terence Jackson (ed.), 150-165. Oxford: Butterworth-Heinemann.
- Holliday, A. (2010). Complexity in cultural identity. Language and Intercultural Communication 10(2): 165-177.
- Holmes, J. (2000a). Doing collegiality and keeping control at work: small talk in government departments. Small Talk. J. Coupland. London, Longman: 32-62.
- Holmes, J. (2000b). Women at work: Analysing women's talk in New Zealand workplaces. Australian Review of Applied Linguistics 22(2): 1-17.
- Holmes, J. and M. Stubbe (2003). Power and Politeness in the Workplace. A Sociolinguistic Analysis of Talk at Work. London, Longman.
- House, R., P. Hanges, et al., Eds. (2004). Culture, Leadership, and Organizations. The GLOBE study of 62 societies. Thousand Oaks, CA, Sage.
- Imahori, T. T. and W. Cupach (2005). Identity management theory. Theorizing About Intercultural Communication. W. Gudykunst. London, Sage: 195-210.
- Jefferson, G., J.M. Atkinson, and J. Heritage (1984). Structures of social action. Cambridge, Cambridge University Press.
- Kendall, S. and D. Tannen (1997). Gender and language in the workplace. Gender and Discourse. R. Wodak. London, Sage: 81-105.
- Kidd, W. (2002). Culture and Identity. Houndmills, Palgrave.
- Kim, Y. Y. (2007). Ideology, identity, and intercultural communication: An analysis of differing academic conceptions of cultural identity. Journal of Intercultural Communication Research 36(3): 237-253.
- Lytra, V. (2009). "
- Marra, M. and J. Holmes (2008). Constructing ethnicity in New Zealand workplace stories. Text & Talk 28(3): 397-419.
- Nair-Venugopal, S. (2009). Interculturalities: Reframing identities in intercultural communication. Language and Intercultural Communication 9(2): 76-90.
- Ng, W. and S. Bernier (2009). The State of Work-Life Balance in Hong Kong. Hong Kong, Community Business.
- Northouse, P. (1997). Leadership. Theory and Practice. London, Sage.
- Ochs, E. (1993) Constructing social identity: a language socialization perspective. Research on Language and Social Interaction 26(3): 287-306.
- Portes, A. (2003). Conclusion: theoretical convergencies and empirical evidence in the study of immigrant transnationalism. International Migration Review 37: 874-892.

Redding, S. G. (1990). The Spirit of Chinese Capitalism. Berlin and New York, Mouton de Gruyter.

Schnurr, S. and O. Zayts (fc). Be(com)ing a leader: a case study of co-constructing professional identities at work. Constructing Identities at Work. J. Angouri and M. Marra. Houndmills, Palgrave.

Selmer, Jan and Corinna de Leon (2003). Culture and management in Hong Kong SAR. In Culture and Management in Asia, Malcolm Warner (ed.), 48-65. London: Routledge Curzon.

Sunderland, Jane and L. Litosseliti (2002). Gender Identity and Discourse Analysis. Amsterdam, John Benjamins.

Ting-Toomey, S. (1993). Communicative resourcefulness: an identity negotiation theory. Intercultural Communication Competence. R. Wiseman and J. Koester. Newbury Park, CA, Sage: 72-111.

Ting-Toomey, S. (2005). Identity negotiation theory: crossing cultural boundaries. Theorizing About Intercultural Communication. W. Gudykunst. London, Sage: 211-233.

Vernon, K. (2009). Work-Life Balance: The Guide. Hong Kong, Community Business.

Westwood, Robert I. (1992). Culture, cultural differences, and organisational behaviour. In Organisational Behaviour: Southeast Asian Perspectives, Robert I. Westwood (ed.), 27-62. Hong Kong: Longman.

Wong, J., P. Wong, L. Heng. (2007). An investigation of leadership styles and relationship cultures of Chinese and expatriate managers in multinational companies in Hong Kong. Construction Management and Economics 25: 95-106.